Jesse James, son of the noted bandit of that name, was graduated from the Kansas City School of Law Friday evening, receiving the highest grade of any in the class of thirty-eight.

He will practice law in that city.

Judge Silas Porter of the Supreme court of Kansas, made the address of the evening and delivered the diplomas.

James is about thirty years old, married and the father of two children.

About ten years ago James established a cigar store at one of the prominent down corners, known as the "Junction," and prospered. Three years later he became a pawnbroker.
